CURRENT RESEARCH

Trafficked? Filipino Migrant Hostesses in Japan’s Nightlife Industry

My project examines the labor and migration of Filipino entertainers in Tokyo, meaning those who sing, dance, and do hostess work in a club, pub or snack bar. For my data, I rely primarily on 61 in-depth interviews conducted between April and November 2005 with female and transgender/sexual entertainers and nearly three months of participant observation working as a hostess in a Philippine pub in Tokyo. Documenting the migration of “entertainers” and the work of migrant hostesses, this project unravels the ways that the moral boundaries of gender, sex, love, and money intersect to shape migration conditions, including the policies of Japan and the Philippines, the nature of hostess work, the intimacies that hostesses maintain with customers, and finally discourses of trafficking in the lives of migrant Filipina entertainers. Two sets of questions direct my study. The first set is directed at the labor migration process and the second analyzes the work of “entertainers”. 1) What are the conditions of migration for Filipino “entertainers” in Japan and how do they negotiate them? How do moral values shape these conditions, significantly state migration policies that determine their migration and settlement? What are the consequences of these morally-driven policies? 2) What are different forms of commodified sexual intimacies that migrant hostesses perform inside and outside the workplace? Under what conditions, social relationships, and in what ways are commodified sexual intimacies morally acceptable or unacceptable for hostesses?
